More Working Women In Appomattox

(Special to the Times-Virginia)

NEW YORK, May 25 — "Women at work" is the order of the day in Appomattox County.

In ever-growing numbers, local women are finding it possible to fulfill their home responsibilities and still have enough free time to permit them to take jobs in industry.

As a result, they are to be found working in offices, in stores, in factories and in the professional fields in greater numbers each year.

Latest Government reports show that 35.2 percent of Appomattox County's female population, age 14 or over, are holding down jobs outside the home.

Compared with the proportion of working women elsewhere in the United States, 34.5 percent, the local ratio is a high one. It is higher, also, than that of the State of Virginia, 34.0 percent.

The extent of the mass movement of women from the home to the job market, and the spurt in that direction in recent years, are brought out in nationwide statistics released by the Department of Labor and by the Census Bureau, based on its 1960 compilations.

They show a total of 1,152 women in the Appomattox County labor force out of an overall female population, age 14 and up, of 3,272. The ratio is well over that shown in previous surveys.

Most of the rise is attributed to married women, who have entered the labor market in droves. Currently, one-third of all married women hold jobs as compared with one-fourth in 1950. Some 13 million of them are now in the labor force.

Today, states the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a large proportion of families with above-average incomes owe their position in no small part to the wife's earnings.

What led to this social revolution on the part of married women? Many housewives found they had time on their hands after finishing their household chores. The extra time, they figured, could be put to profitable use.

For others, the added income was a matter of necessity — to bolster the family bankroll, to pay for Junior's education and the like.

The official count shows, for Appomattox County, that 32.1 percent of all local jobs are now held by women.

For the United States, the ratio is 32.7 percent and, for the State of Virginia, 33.6 percent.

Korea, Indochina, Vietnam. "There shall be wars and rumors of wars" until that great and terrible day of the Lord."

The few remarks I have to make about the honored dead this afternoon will be confined to heroes of the Confederacy—one in particular—Lt. Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, the mighty "Stonewall"!

When the war broke out between the States, Jackson was placed in command of the advanced cadets at Virginia Military Institute, in Lexington, Virginia, and ordered to conduct them to Richmond in order that they might drill new recruits in the Confederate Army.

Jackson was only a week in Richmond, and then was given command of the Virginia forces at Harper's Ferry. There, he began the brilliant career which ended at Chancellorsville, with a shattered arm. One success after another brought him fame and respect, not only in the South, but in the North he became a legend. His men idolized him and cheered when he rode by. His presence on the field of battle seemed to be all that was needed to inspire his troops to victory.

At the Battle of First Manassas, his beloved brigade stood and held like a stone wall; thus his nickname came into being. His supreme arbiter was the bayonet, and his common shout was, "Close up ranks, and give them the bayonet". I don't want them to be brave.

But what many people do not know is that tough "Old Jack" was a man of God. He, more than any other man was responsible for the revival of religion which broke out in the Confederate Army during the war.

When Jackson's troops were not engaged in battle, he would have prayer meetings and bible study groups organized throughout the command. All available clergymen were summoned to his camp to preach the love of Christ to his men. And his men responded with a commitment to the Savior, just like they had responded to the call of the Stars and Bars of the Confederacy. And the revival spread throughout the Southland, God was using Civil War U. call men unto Himself, and Jackson could see the great trust of Romans 8:28 taking place before his eyes: "All things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose."

Always the invincible Stonewall on the battlefield, and yet the devout man of God was Jackson. Always much prayer before and after the din of battle. Prayer was his vital breath and the word of God was his food.

Then came Chancellorsville, and in the twilight after a great victory, his own men shot him by mistake. One week later, he went to meet his Lord, succombing to the loss of blood from his wounds and arm amputation, and a pulmonary infection. His LAST WORDS give evidence to his great faith: "Let us cross over the river and rest under the shade of the trees"—of the river which flows by the throne.

General Robert E. Lee said, "I have lost my right arm."

Jackson's "stone wall" brigade continued on until that day two years later in April 1865, when they arrived here on the retreat from Petersburg. Things were not the same without "Old Jack". Only a handful of his brave men were
